

New Central Elementary School Building. It was first built in 1923 after fire destroyed the old Central School. Additions were made to the building in 1948.

With the completion of the North School, Heber's board of education voted to have one principal direct the activities of the two elementary schools. David A. Broadbent was selected for the position and served until he was succeeded by A. M. Hansen. In 1910 the work of the schools had grown sufficiently that a principal was selected for each school. Principals of the North School have included Attewall Wootton Jr., Henry Moulton, ElRoy Jones, Nell Kowallis, Walter Harrison and Elvin Giles. Principals at the Central School have been Henry Aird, Attewall Wootton, Jr., ElRoy Jones, Lawrence Green, Elvin Giles and Walter Harrison.

On a cold, wintery night in January, 1923, residents of Heber were roused from their beds with the news that the Central School was burning. Efforts were made to save the school, but they failed and the building was lost.

Within a few days, County Superintendent D. A. Broadbent and teachers in the school had located temporary quarters in every available vacant room in the city and classwork resumed.

Construction began immediately on a modern, one-story brick building, which was ready for occupancy by September of that year. Additions were made to the building in 1948 at a cost of $120,000, and paid for without bonding the district or contracting any debt.
